Schools and Colleges will have to prepare to take on the responsibility of providing IAG.

With more pressure on university places, less public funding and an increase in tuition fees in HE, it is more important than ever for pupils and applicants to make the right education and career choices through good Information, Advice and Guidance (IAG).

As progressing into higher education is not the only option for young people, IAG is to be tailored to individuals' needs, skills and ambitions.

This conference will bring together experts and leaders from schools, the further and higher education sector, local authorities and all others involved in the provision of IAG, to hear what the future holds for IAG.
